

Workshop

Co-creative Transactional Analysis

With

Keith Tudor, PhD, Teaching and Supervising Transactional Analyst

Saturday 20th August 2016

Co-creative transactional analysis emphasises the “co” (mutual, joint) aspect of professional relationships, whether therapeutic, educative, and/or consultative – and, by implication, of personal relationships. The “co” of co-creative acknowledges the transactional, inter-relational, mutual, joint, and co-operative, as well as partnership. The word “creative” is an intentional reference to what is original, imaginative, intuitive and spontaneous about the encounter between human beings. Together, the suffix and the root word describe what emerges between therapist, practitioner, supervisor and client.

In this workshop, and in conjunction with the participants, Keith will present the principles of co-creative transactional analysis, the philosophical influences on its development, as well as its contribution to contemporary transactional analysis theory and practice. There will be opportunities for discussion, demonstrations, presentation of clinical and other material, and small group work.
